This exhibit challenges hegemonic conceptions of human-water relations, particularly in the Iberian/Mediterranean context. Through this artistic-documentary photography project, the photographer invites to rethink the current irrigation development model from the perspective of place, and particularly the relationship between space, place and value/s in water governance.

The photographer highlights the complex interrelationships between society, technology, and biodiversity, driven by a reflection about the impacts of different spatial and political-economic models on the agroecosystems upon which they depend.

Ultimately, this exhibit intends to contribute to reflect on how hydrosocial places matter to irrigators, academics, artists and activists, and to their mutual learning in the context of global and local anthropocenes.
